Two weeks later, the results were in. The supervisor, Caryn the clinical psychologist, was right. "You are my supervisor," she said, handing me a smile. "You will have to be a supervisor one of these days." She handed me a pink slip with a two-paragraph speech on the fly. "You are not able to fill this position," she said, "because no one needs someone like you. You must not apply to any other facility in the area, because you do not have any skills that any other facility would need. No one needs someone to offer a job description with no qualification requirements. And no one needs someone who thinks two years of clinical training and life experience makes them qualified to take on leadership responsibilities. Trust me, no one needs someone like you. You are a disappointment to the women who work here, and the supervisors hate you." I was not prepared for the eight weeks of probation I had earned, and I did not believe in the possibility of promotion. When she handed me the forms to complete, to get my own badge and uniform, I refused to fill them out. "Fill them out," she said
