Summary Our Score Design & Build The P52+ works very smoothly, and the whole device is built with a premium feel. There's a great amount of functionality, with a good number of controls on the front, middle, and back of the device. With a 340 x 320 widescreen QVGA (QVGA=240 x 320) touchscreen, that's very sharp and responsive to the touch, though some of the newer Windows 7 programmes, such as Adobe Photoshop Elements, may struggle to respond smoothly. The top and bottom bezels on the P52+ are also very slim, though this is counterbalanced by the presence of a small web cam on the top of the device, and a slightly chunky 800mAh battery on the back. The P52+ supports VGA, SVGA, Video, Landscape, Portrait, QVGA and WVGA screens, and works across Windows 98/XP/2003 and Windows Vista. You get a USB connector to connect it to your PC, a 3.5-millimetre port to connect to a monitor, and a standard 3.5mm headphone jack to link it up with your headphones, along with a standard microSD Card slot. The P52+ is available in a number of colours - black, dark blue, gray, pink, red, and silver. The only difference between them is the colour of the plastic casing - the cheaper models are painted in a matt black finish, with the more expensive models being glossy. Performance The touch screen display is responsive, and the P52+ feels quite solid, but it's not waterproof or dustproof. Of course, it will work in anything but the rain or underwater. The P52+ is powered by a 1.2GHz single-core Intel Atom processor. Unlike the Windows XP version, there's no option to install Linux on the current version of the P52+. The P52+ is a full dual-core Windows 7 laptop, which will handle all of your general computing needs. It also comes with a suite of software that's been chosen by the Olympus corporation. Mainly, the camera software features include time-lapse photography, as well as image editing software - which you can use to improve a picture you've taken. There's also a remote control application for the camera if you wish to use the device for self-portraiture - you can set the camera
