Republican offices in the House and Senate received complaints and demands from the March for Our Lives movement for two weeks after the shooting. “We and our students should be able to focus on healing and justice, not be distracted by opportunistic politicians looking to exploit the situation for their own political agenda,” gun control activist David Hogg wrote to Senate Republicans on Tuesday, according to the Washington Post. Shortly after, several Republican senators refused to consider a bill to prohibit the use of expired federal grants to fund anti-gun violence programs. In early July, students from hundreds of schools across the United States marched in Washington, D.C., to highlight the assault on their right to a safe school environment. Many of the young people who spoke at the rally signed letters to the Republican leadership. One student said, “We are literally students and survivors of the worst school shooting in this country’s history. We are tired of your inaction and will not stand for anymore of your games.” Politicians like Cindy Hyde-Smith and Lamar Alexander have thus far refused to stand with the students. Rosenblatt wrote that “a single expenditure of nearly $60 million on the Centers
