This tech has a few benefits: It makes quicker, more accurate player movement feel better. It allows gameplay of an express pass, in-possession move, or a long range shot to feel more like you're playing the original game, rather than running through a short animation before receiving the ball. It also adds more acrobatic movement, giving you more of a feeling of height as you tackle or run through the air. The goalkeepers are among the first to use the tech. Some of you may remember that while FIFA 20 made a ton of improvements to its goalkeeping AI, that AI can be really, really bad at reading a keeper. Big errors like tipping the ball over a keeper or failing to tip a ball over led to goals, and from time to time the 2K series would get the goalkeeping sequences on in motion capture mode. As FUT 20 was released, EA made an adjustment that gave players a better goalkeeping AI. If you've played FIFA 20, you'll know that you have a specific indicator on your radar when you're playing a game, and if your keeper is beaten, you'll hear a bell sound and see a break in the middle of the screen that will alert you to the fact that he's fallen, allowing you to look for your next shot. EA was planning on introducing that tech to FIFA 21, but couldn't make that happen due to the AI struggles. Thus, the company decided to hold off until the right time. In FIFA 22, the play-action system was in a difficult state, and so EA decided to use these motion capture videos of goalkeepers in action, and the rest is history. FIFA 22 is going to be playable at EA Play in Las Vegas on August 24-27, before it launches on September 13. If you're a EA Play veteran or a player that has been away from the game for years, you can also go to EA.com and download a play-test version of the game.
