The aim of the present study was to assess the effects of ultrasound on healing of a bone defect around implants in a prefabricated 3D bone-implant model in vivo. Forty osseointegrated implants (SLA) were placed in the metaphysis of the proximal humerus in four intact animals in each group. Subsequent ultrasound treatment was performed immediately after insertion in one group. After 4 weeks, each group was divided into a non-treated and treated group. Radiographically bone formation and bone-to-implant contact around the implants were assessed at 4 weeks and 12 weeks, respectively. Radiographically, the insertion of implants and ultrasound application seemed to improve the radiographic bone-to-implant contact in treated specimens, whereas no significant difference in bone formation was found between the treated and non-treated specimens. Histomorphometrical assessment of treated specimens revealed a significantly greater bone-to-implant contact around the implants than around the non-treated implants 4 weeks post

1. Field of the Invention The present invention relates to a power steering system for a vehicle such as an automobile which assists the steering effort of an operator. More particularly, the present invention is concerned with a power steering system which responds to steering wheel changes during a steering operation. 2.

Description of the Prior Art A typical power steering system for an automobile, as disclosed in Japanese Patent Application Laid-open (Kokai) No. 57-205459, comprises an electric power motor for assisting the steering force of an operator to steer the vehicle, a control device for controlling the power motor, a hydraulic pump for supplying and discharging hydraulic fluid to and from the power motor, a flow control valve disposed between the control device and the hydraulic pump for controlling the flow rate of the fluid supplied from the hydraulic pump to the control device. In this power steering system, the control device comprises a hydraulic control circuit which includes an adder unit, a differential operational amplifier, a regulator valve, and a directional valve. The adder

The ability to detect and manipulate gene function in live cells is critical for understanding the roles of virulence genes in pathogenesis, to define which genes are essential for adaptation to and persistence in a host, and to develop antimicrobial and pathogen-targeted treatment strategies. Conventional approaches to study gene function in bacteria include molecular genetics approaches, in which mutations are made in the gene of interest and characterized, and phenotypic analyses of the effect of mutations on bacterial pathogenicity, growth, and survival in host cells. Although such approaches are highly informative, they lack the ability to manipulate gene function in live bacterial pathogens while preserving their pathogenicity and survival. In recent years, a series of tools for live-cell labeling, fluorescent tagging, photoactivation, and photoconversion have been developed for use in the study of bacterial gene function. The implementation of these technologies in the study of bacterial genes with defined phenotypes provides a powerful complement to established methods.
