Family history of Parkinson disease and cognitive performance in schizophrenia: evidence for dopamine hypothesis? A number of studies suggest that schizophrenia is associated with an increased prevalence of cognitive impairment and dementia, and this association is thought to be partly due to underlying vascular pathophysiology. Such associations have also been reported in cognitively impaired patients with early-onset Parkinson disease, which is associated with atypical forms of schizophrenia. We have investigated whether the prevalence of dementia in patients with schizophrenia is increased in comparison to healthy control subjects, and if an increased prevalence is found, whether the relationship of dementia to schizophrenia is modified by the family history of dementia. A group of 1487 patients with schizophrenia was recruited from the Schizophrenia Patient Outcomes Research Team database and matched to 5738 healthy control subjects from the 1958 British Birth Cohort, taking age, sex, and ethnicity into account. The cognitive domains of verbal memory, working memory, perceptual speed, and verbal fluency were measured using the Mattis Dementia Rating Scale and the WAIS Information subtest. Patients with schizophrenia were more likely to be female, younger
