A recent report used mitochondrial sequencing to infer the first exact molecular phylogeny for gorillas, a taxon for which the data were thought to be very poor. One surprising result was that Lowland Gorilla (Gorilla beringei graueri) did not cluster in a clade with Bornean Gorilla (Gorilla beringei beringei) but in a clade with Mountain Gorilla (Gorilla beringei beringei). However, extensive mitochondrial sampling in gorillas, and an exhaustive list of morphological characters supporting this phylogeny (Balk et al. 2005), was lacking. We sequenced the entire mitochondrial genomes of four samples of each species, allowing for an assessment of the whole mitochondrial genome. The phylogenetic analyses were repeated using this new, more complete, dataset. We find that the Lowland Gorilla and Bornean Gorilla are sister taxa, but that Mountain Gorilla was not the ancestral lineage. Furthermore, the first great split in gorillas was between Eastern and Western Gorilla, before the split of the two clades of lowland gorillas, and that group of lowland gorillas is rather divergent from other gorillas.
