Conventional clinical assessments are inefficient for early diagnosis of neuropsychiatric symptoms (NPS) and their underlying causes, which are highly heterogeneous. We present the development and demonstration of integrated artificial intelligence-based neuroimaging and physiological tools for early diagnosis of dementia. Clinical assessment and functional magnetic resonance imaging (fMRI) scans were collected from 39 dementia and 122 control subjects. We trained and validated a support vector machine (SVM) to differentiate between healthy and demented participants in an end-to-end fashion. This "clinical SVM" was then trained, validated, and applied to multimodal neuroimaging and physiological data. We produced a multimodal "multidimensional clinical processing" (MCP) model by fusing data from the trained clinical SVM with multimodal neuroimaging and physiological data. The MCP analysis was then performed using the trained clinical SVM. A permutation-based hypothesis test of receiver operating characteristics (ROC) was used to evaluate the performance of this model.

The MCP analysis revealed that NPS are primarily underpinned by abnormalities in the default mode network, salience network, and limbic system-dopamine system. Clinical indicators alone could not distinguish demented participants from controls with over 60% accuracy; however, the use of MCP analysis improved the accuracy to 92%. The use of integrated multimodal data to help clinicians better understand underlying pathophysiology of NPS may facilitate early diagnosis and further the development of novel treatments for NPS.
