Restoring Groundwater Environment and Development in Regional Carbon Cycles in High Altitude Himalayan India to Prevent Climate Change. This study investigates impacts of anthropogenic activities, erosion and climate change in the High Altitude Himalayan Rivers (HAHIRs) and their implications for water quality, hydrology and vegetation. Environmental impacts are studied in terms of water quality, ground water levels, climate and vegetation. Study area is divided in to seven districts. Most rivers in the regions are of glacier origin and are now transited to groundwater. They are susceptible to be affected by human activities and ecosystem degradation. Watersheds receive high precipitation in the monsoon (4-11000 mm). Climate change is observed in the regions that is having an impact on socio-economic activities and natural resources. Five major rivers, Kedarnath, Mandakini, Rumsu, Teesta and Bhagirathi flow in these districts and have major contribution in the regional economy. Over exploitation of groundwater resources and dam constructions due to high pressure and withdrawal of water from rivers are the major drivers for environmental degradation in the regions. To support the sustainable development in the region, government efforts should focus on regional planning, fiscal planning for infrastructure, protecting local flora and fauna, restoration of aquatic ecosystems, comprehensive watershed management and plans for water resources, flood control and rehabilitation of vulnerable structures.

Q: Ajax form GET to different html file (php) with query params Ajax form POST to: /file.php?src=example/file.html Works fine. Ajax form GET to: /file.php?src=example/file.html&name=xyz Does not work fine. It returns a 404 error page. How can I make it work for the params that do not have the full file path? A: Following @chepner's answer I edited it so that it also checks for the existence of the files. function rest_file_query_parse ($val) { // Get the source path $url = $_SERVER['REQUEST_URI']; // Split the URL to find the path $path = explode ('/', $url); // Check if the path exists if (!file_exists ($path[count($path) -1]

Q: The behaviour of my loop in C int main() { printf("test-value"); int a=5; int b=1; while(b==1) { printf("loop"); b=b/2; if(b==0) { break; } } return 0; } Is my output of this program as follows test-value loop loop loop loop loop loop loop loop loop loop loop loop loop loop loop Or is my logic wrong? A: No, that is not your logic. printf("loop"); prints the string, then prints out the newline character. So on the first loop iteration, it will print "loop ". on the second, it will print "loop loop ", on the third it will print "loop loop loop ", and so on. While you can use printf to provide some debug info, it's better to use more reliable means of logging, such as checking an error log file. You should definitely log each invocation of loop with a date stamp and time so that you can find the logs easily, and you could set up the program to start a new log file each time that loop is run. Before releasing this article, I wanted to know whether it would be considered flame-bait, and what the option was to get my view published. While getting this article published is an entirely different issue, I was concerned that it would be used as a vehicle to ban people who have a view different than the release. I was told that taking a position that my article was 'sexist' and 'unacceptable', coupled with the fact I do not write for the right on the right, would leave me no choice but to remove myself from the right, either to return
