A large wave of water swept through the coal-fired plant as winds pummelled the country's north, inundating workers' accommodation and knocking out communication systems. Emergency workers said they had feared for the plant's staff after the quake, which was felt across the country's largest city of Johannesburg. The earthquake, which lasted about five minutes, shook the country at around 1330 GMT and was felt over a large area of South Africa. South Africa's mining industry has been hit by protests as well as deadly storms over the past two weeks in its deadliest-ever year on record. Coalmine protests erupted in February as South Africa pledged to phase out all production by 2030 as part of efforts to tackle climate change. "You can see the reservoir behind the power station. There was an overflow that swept through the power station and was washing everything outside," an AFP reporter saw at the site. "There was so much water flowing into the office that it was impossible for people to move about. We've been asked to stay away." The power station was built in the 1970s and is mostly used for backup generation. It is one of three coal-fired
